BUILDING THE GREEN WALL

IN PORTLAND, OR, A COMBINATION of direct action and public policy change by activists from PDF-funded organizations is halting the building of more fossil fuel infrastructure. This was the strongest fossil fuel infrastructure ban in any city in the U.S. The City's ordinance bans large new fossil fuel terminals and forbids existing terminals from expanding in size.

A years-long battle in Portland resulted in this tremendous success. As a key player in this victory, PDF grantee Center for Sustainable Economy (CSE), is consulting with other port cities such as Baltimore, Vancouver, Richmond (CA) and Seattle, and urging a statewide ban. Thanks to CSE's efforts, Portland has created the first "climate justice youth commission," to advise the City on their climate strategies moving forward.

"We worked very hard in Portland over several years to push our City Council to say no to new fossil fuel infrastructure. We hoped that others in our region and around the nation would follow suit," said CSE Climate Justice Program Director Daphne Wysham. "This is the kind of no nonsense, bottom-up, grassroots action and bold local leadership we need everywhere if we are to meet and exceed the terms of the Paris Accords. With record temperatures, violent storms and weather-related crop failure and drought around the world, we urgently need every city in the world to follow Portland's example."

Their model of legal action and in-the-streets demonstration is spreading to other port cities: "We are building a wall, and it is a green wall of resistance along the port cities of the west coast," climate justice grantees told PDF at a spring meeting. Now the green wall is moving east.

The pushback is fierce. This spring, President Trump ordered Scott Pruitt, the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, to repeal the Clean Power Plan, which was aimed at reducing carbon dioxide emissions from coal-fired power plants, and Mr. Pruitt gleefully complied this fall. This was another blow to the many Americans who experience environmental destruction in their own backyards.

The Appalachian Mountains stretch across a wide region of the U.S., from the tip of Maine all the way down to Alabama. It is a region rich in natural resources, and its remaining mountains are home to one of the most biologically diverse ecosystems on the planet. One organization that is fighting to preserve and improve this region is The Alliance for Appalachia.

According to Alliance Coordinator Christa Faulkner, "Poverty, poor health, pollution, deforestation, cultural loss, absentee land ownership and political corruption — these issues plague our communities and are perpetuated by the region's toxic legacy of coal mining. For over a century, Appalachia has paid a price for our nation's energy demands, which has compounded social and environmental issues." They are forced to deal with legacy costs of old mines, including poor water quality, health and standards of living.

A heavily contributing factor to the environmental degradation is mountaintop removal. It is a relatively new form of coal mining in which explosives are used to remove land and extract coal seams. This method requires less money and fewer employees than traditional mining, but has negative effects on surrounding communities as excess rock and soil are dumped into valley fills, polluting waterways and damaging ecosystems.

Alliance for Appalachia won hard-fought regulations that decreased mountaintop removal mining and its impacts, but new mines are still being proposed and their communities are still under threat as the regulations are rolled back by or challenged by Federal, state and local governments.

Eight months after Portland's City Council voted to ban fossil fuel infrastructure, proponents of the fossil fuel industry challenged Portland's fossil fuel terminal zoning restrictions as unconstitutional. But the City Council is standing firm and PDF grantees are holding their legislators accountable.

"The main benefit of receiving this grant from PDF was the training we were offered through The Sustainability Project. Because of the training, we were able to bring together our members and key supporters in dialogue about the financial health of our organization, and are now seeing more member and supporter engagement in our fund-raising efforts."

government were preparing to make decisions about the future of our energy system, and we couldn't stand for that," says new grantee, Philly Thrive. Philly Thrive believes residents who live in the shadows of the refinery and the oil trains — key pieces of current energy infrastructure — should have a central role in decision-making about the future of their energy system.

This past June, Philly Thrive collaborated with Physicians for Social Responsibility to host an educational workshop at the South Philadelphia Health and Literary Center. The "Perspectives on our Right to Breathe" event gathered community members, health professionals, researchers, and students together to share experiences and information on the health impacts of living close to the largest oil refinery on the east coast, and to discuss ways to prevent fossil fuel infrastructure from poisoning Philadelphia's future.

"The results of the 2016 U.S. elections and the announcement of U.S. withdrawal from the Paris Climate Accord have increased the need to heighten our work," contends Wyolah Garden, executive director of Women's Earth and Climate Action Network (WECAN). "We are providing increased opportunities for frontline women leaders and their communities for climate justice, movement building and grassroots organizing."

WECAN engages women grassroots activists, Indigenous and business leaders, scientists, policy makers, farmers, academics and culture-shapers to stop the escalation of climate change and environmental and community degradation. At the same time, they are accelerating the implementation of just climate solutions through women's empowerment, advocacy at international policy forums, trainings, on-the-ground projects, advocacy campaigns, and political, economic, social and environmental action.

"Thank you for the Peace Development Fund's grant of $10,000 to 350 Seattle for general operating support," 350 Seattle's Valerie Costa wrote. "Given the nature of our work, having flexible funding to respond to opportunities and threats is particularly useful!"

"And despite so many victories, there is still so much to do to transition to 100 percent renewables in a just way. Thankfully, there is unprecedented interest in organizing and affecting change together, and with funding like yours we are better equipped to transform this energy into action." ■

Community Organizing Grants for Climate Justice

IN 2015, PDF'S BOARD MEMBERS attended the United Nations Convention on Climate Change, where the Paris Agreement was formed. This was the third time PDF engaged at the international level at the Conference of the Parties (COP) to the 1992 United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. We have seen first-hand the global fight for climate justice, and we are continuing to move that energy forward in our community organizing grants.

This year, we had the opportunity to fund eight climate-oriented organizations from around the United States. They work in a diverse range of communities, from the Appalachian Mountains to the streets of Seattle, all with the same goal of protecting our planet and their homes. Four of the groups are also receiving capacity building training through The Sustainability Project, PDF's three-year program focused on building infrastructure for grassroots groups.
